

Allen,

In 2017 I underwent surgery and six months of chemo therapy for ovarian cancer. The worst side effects of chemo were neuropathy, fatigue, and a diagnosis of Hashimoto's disease.

My son had told me about Ozone Therapy and suggested I try it. After several months of his urging, I gave in and started on a regimen of Ozone twice a week.

After a few treatments, I realized I was sleeping better. For years I would wake up several times and not able to get back to sleep. In fact after the first treatment I slept all night.

Because of the neuropathy my oncologist had prescribed Gabapentin three times daily. After a few weeks of Ozone I decreased the dosage to once daily. Now I may not take anything unless I have done an unusual amount of walking.

Thyroid bloodwork has improved greatly and Hashimoto symptoms have shown a gradual change for the better. The only other treatment was to continue on a daily dose of thyroid medication, which I had been taking for at least 10 years.

For me the most significant change was the CA125 test results after I started Ozone. The results lowered from 11 to between 4 and 5, and have maintained that level.

I highly recommend Ozone Therapy to anyone recovering from chemo therapy treatments. Definitely improved my overall health.
